That would make sense from view of not having all that pressure inside all shock bellows all the time. Leaking some gas back into accumulator tank (or through shocks bellow), would allow pressure to reduce, prolonging life of shock. Only when you enter car, and start driving it, does the gas process start, to pump into shocks for driving.

You measure the average low pressure on the low side of the system. You then measure the average temperature of the low pressure gas at the evaporator's outlet next to the external thermal sensing bulb. Using an R134a PT chart you locate the corresponding saturation temperature associated with the low pressure reading you observed.
